PAY THE PRINTER.

I heard a voice from Heaven which said: "I'll shower down blessings on your head if you'll give a chance to pay for his bread, To the Printer."

If you'll settle, at once, your long arrears Of months that have run into weary years; And ally the bitter and anxious tears Of the Printer.

If you'll give him a chance to straighten his form—

To grow strong 'gainst the weight of the gathering storm;

To cheer his heart while it still beats warm In the Printer.

If you'll give him a draught of hope to drink And stop his steps on bankruptcy's brink; Oh, turn from your selfishness, just to think Of the Printer!

So I gathered up dollars so clear and bright That they shone like the stars in the sky at night;

And they filled the heart (with a strange delight) Of the Printer.

And Bill promised me now, and I promise you too.

That while I to myself and my kind am true,

To never keep money that's honestly due To the Printer.

Globe, A. T. D. R.

A Gold Mine Secret.

The northern seas seem to possess a fascination for the sailor. In every group of ancient mariners encountered along the water front, there can be found some hardy son of Neptune who has braved the rigors of an Arctic winter, and who has seen strange sights in the "thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice." No matter how hard his experience may have been, the sailor who has once been in north latitudes is always ready to ship again for the frozen zone. Seated in the pilot house of a bay steamer the other night, we heard a strange and pathetic story of the Alaska coast. The narrator was the grizzled captain of the boat, who himself had been through many vicissitudes. A native of the Island of Jersey, he took to water as naturally as a duck, and pulled on a rope's end before he was twelve years old. An acquaintance with Wilmington, North Carolina, harbor gave him a chance during the late war to do a promiscuous business in the line of blockade running, and his narrative of his experiences on the Southern coast was extremely exciting. The conversation turning on Alaska, the Captain lighted a fresh Havana and said: "About ten years ago, when I first came to the coast, the first man I met on the water front was Ben T. He was a 'towney' of mine, for he and I were boys together in Jersey, and we both went to sea together. I was a little out at the elbow and had no friends in the city. He was employed on a coaster as mate, and he spoke to his owners and got me a berth. We run together until some five years ago, when he got a job with the Alaska Fur Company and went North. In about a year he returned, and coming aboard the boat where I was employed he called me aside and exhibited a piece of rock literally encrusted with gold. The piece of rock was about the size of his fist, and it yielded at Price's office when melted down over $60 in coin. It made my mouth water to look at it, and my first question was, 'Where did it come from?' Bill replied, 'From Alaska; and he went on to tell me how it came into his possession. He said that a big Indian chief on the coast had taken a fancy to him and had one day given him this specimen, saying at the same time that there was a whole mountain full of it and that he would guide Bill to it. Bill was shrewd enough to pledge his Indian friend to secrecy and soon afterwards returned to San Francisco, intending to raise money enough to get a prospecting outfit and then give the mine a fair trial. I took a share at once in the enterprise, as I had saved up some money and had a few hundred dollars in the locker. We let one other friend have a share. We chartered a schooner, ostensibly for a fishing cruise, and fitted her out for a twelve months trip. I intended to go, but a week before the time set for departure I fell down the hatchway of the boat one dark night on the Sacramento river and broke a leg, so I was counted out. The other shareholder was a water-front provision dealer, and he could not leave his business. The vessel finally sailed with Bill as captain, a mate and four sailors. The mate and sailors were shipped for a fishing cruise, and were ignorant of Bill's intentions. To keep up the deception, Bill, on his arrival on the coast, commenced fishing vigorously and soon had a good catch. By degrees he worked his vessel slowly towards the point where he expected to meet his Indian friend, and finally arrived in the immediate vicinity of the camp. The signs for fish were good, and a small boat was sent out in charge of one of the men to see the lines. As the man returned to the
